

Somerset council proposing to end bus privileges for children attending faith schools

Posted: Mon, 30th Sep 2013

Somerset County Council is proposing to reduce subsidies for transport to faith schools in order to bring them into line with those for non-faith schools.

At present, the council subsidises transport costs for children travelling to religious schools by an average of £440. Consequently, children travelling to these schools only pay on average £240 a year for the school bus.

Children travelling to non-religious schools pay £602 a year.

Under the proposals, the council would still pay a subsidy for faith school transport, but the charges would be brought in line with that paid by non-faith parents.

This is likely to affect about 200 families across Somerset.

The council has now launched a consultation about the proposals, which closes on 4 November.

The council pulled back from an original proposal to scrap faith school transport altogether after pressure from the schools and parents.

Councillor Frances Nicholson, cabinet member for children and families, said: "The current proposals have been put together in response to the feedback we received to previous proposals on the issue of faith transport subsidies. It's important that we hear the views of the public and that we take that into account when we are considering changes like this."

A decision on the new proposals is due in December. If accepted, the proposals will only affect children starting or transferring to a faith school from September 2014.
