

Schools and segregation: a lesson from France

Posted: Tue, 30th Jan 2018 by Keith Sharpe

The Government is preparing to extend religious selection in faith schools. Keith Sharpe contrasts its willingness to cause greater segregation with French efforts to encourage integration in the wake of terror attacks.

For secularists interested in education 2018 has not got off to a good start. The prime minister's somewhat shambolic Cabinet reshuffle included the appointment of Damian Hinds as Education Secretary. In 2014 as a backbench MP he spoke out against the 50% cap on religious selection in new faith schools. It has turned out to be a good career move. In the 2017 election Theresa May made a pledge that she would axe the 50% cap so faith schools could select 100% of pupils on the basis of faith.

Theresa May believes faith schools are better schools and wants more of them. Some faith groups claimed a 50% cap on discrimination was holding them back from opening new schools and so the PM was keen to get rid of it. But the previous education secretary, Justine Greening, was less enthusiastic, and this was undoubtedly a factor in her being sacked. Theresa May has spoken particularly approvingly of Catholic schools, and now she has a Catholic education secretary who is only too keen to do her bidding. The Catholic Church has long lobbied for an end to the 50% cap and it must be overjoyed with Hinds's appointment. It is interesting also to note that he listed in the registry of members' interests a donation of over £5,000 by the Catholic Church to provide a parliamentary intern for him in 2014.

Hinds argues that scrapping the limit on faith-based admissions will allow faith schools to preserve their "specialness" over time and prevent dilution by other faith demographics. His concern was principally with Catholic schools but the scrapping of the cap will apply to all faith schools and could lead to even more Muslim-only and Jewish-only schools.

Only a month ago the Head of Ofsted, Amanda Spielman, issued a stark warning about faith schools promoting segregation rather than integration. In particular she drew attention to a growing number of highly conservative faith schools which work to actively undermine fundamental British values. Inspectors found that 58% of 160 independent Islamic schools visited are either inadequate or require improvement. For independent Jewish schools the figure is approximately 50%, and approximately a third of independent Christian schools are in the same category.

After the terror attacks of 2017 the British Government might have been reasonably expected to promote integration rather than segregation. On the other side of the Channel this is precisely what the French Government did in 2015 after the Charlie Hebdo attack in January of that year. France has had a long tradition of secular education, and the response of Francois Hollande's cabinet was to beef up the provision of 'Enseignement Moral et Civique' in all state schools. From September 2015 all pupils between the ages of 6 and 16 would receive 300 hours of nationally determined civic teaching during their schooling. This was designed to instil the cultural values of liberty, equality and fraternity as well as a detailed understanding of the rights and responsibilities of citizens. Najat Vallaud Belkacem, the Moroccan-born minister for women's rights at the time, said:

"We have to reappropriate the concept of laïcité, so we can explain to our young pupils that whatever their faith, they belong to this idea and they're not excluded. Secularism is not something against them; it protects them...Laïcité is about saying we're a country where individuals can have whatever beliefs, or lack of beliefs, they choose and the public powers must be neutral towards them."

What a difference 21 miles of Channel seawater can make in social policy. On this side the removal of the 50% cap and the expansion of faith schools are seriously retrograde steps which will further divide the country, and at a time when more than ever we need children of all faiths and none to be educated together in inclusive schools. We could learn a useful lesson or two from our nearest neighbours on the continent.

Keith Sharpe

Keith Sharpe is a former professor of education and the coordinator of the Secular Education Forum. The views in this article are those of the author and do not necessarily represent those of the National Secular Society.

End religious discrimination in school admissions

Our schools shouldn't select pupils based on faith. Join our campaign.

- Find out more
- Write to your MP

- Share on What's App
- Share on Facebook
- Share on Twitter
- Share on Email
- Subscribe to RSS Feed

Tags: Faith schools, School admissions, Unregistered schools

Related Campaigns

-

No more faith schools

We need inclusive schools free from religious discrimination, privilege or control.

Read More

-

End religious discrimination in school admissions

No child should face discrimination for their family's religion or belief.

Read More

•

End unregistered schools

All children in all communities have the right to a decent education in safe settings.

Read More

Related Articles

Allowing more religious selection in schools would be a big mistake

Abandoning the 50% admission cap would exacerbate the discrimination, disadvantage and division inherent with faith schools, argues Stephen Evans. Read More »

NSS joins open letter against faith school discrimination

Education experts, politicians, religious leaders and public figures unite to call on Education Secretary to keep the faith school admissions cap. Read More »

NSS urges PM to retain cap on faith-based admissions

Supporters of inclusive schools encouraged to tell MPs to protect the 50% cap. Read More »

NSS alarmed at plan to let new schools select all pupils based on faith

Faith-based academies could be free to select all pupils based on religion within months, sources say. Read More »

Integrated communities require inclusive, secular schools

A government plan on integration sets out a positive vision on education - but faith schools remain the elephant in... Read More »